Your company has three offices. Each office contains servers that run Windows Server 2008 R2. The servers are configured as file servers.

Users regularly travel between offices and require access to corporate data stored on their respective home servers. You need to plan a data access policy for the users. The solution must ensure that users can access corporate data from a local server when they are traveling.

What should you include in your plan?

- A. On all servers, install and configure the File Server Resource Manager (FSRM) and the File Replication Service (FRS).
- B. On one server, install and configure the File Server Resource Manager (FSRM). On the other two servers, install and configure the File Replication Service (FRS).
- C. On one server, install and configure Distributed File System (DFS). On the other two servers, install and configure the Background Intelligent Transfer Service (BITS).
- D. On all servers, install and configure Distributed File System (DFS).

Answer: D

Explanation:

To create a data access policy for the users that would ensure that users can access corporate data from a local server when they are traveling, you need to configure Distributed File System (DFS) on all the servers of the company. With DFS, you can make files distributed across multiple servers appear to users as if they reside in one place on the network. Users no longer need to know and specify the actual physical location of files in order to access them.
