NEW QUESTION: 1
Which one of the following temporary differences will result in a deferred tax asset?
A. Advance rental receipts accounted for on the accrual basis for financial statement purposes and on a cash basis for tax purposes.

B. Prepaid expenses accounted for on the accrual basis for determining accounting profit and on a cash basis for determining taxable profit tax loss.
C. Installment sale profits accounted for on the accrual basis for determining accounting profit and on a cash basis for determining taxable profit tax loss.
D. Use of the straight-line depreciation method for determining accounting profit and an accelerated method for determining taxable profit tax loss.
Answer: A
Explanation:
A deferred tax asset records the deferred tax consequences attributable to deductible temporary differences and carry forwards Advance rental receipts accounted for on the actual basis for determining accounting profit and on a cash basis for determining taxable profit tax loss) would give rise to a deferred tax asset. The financial statements would show no income and no related tax expense because the rental payments apply to future periods. The tax return, however, would show the rent as income when the cash was received, and a tax would be due in the year of receipt. Because the tax is paid prior to recording accounting profits, it represents an asset that will be no due in the year of receipt. Because the tax is paid to prior to recording accounting profits, it represents an asset that will be recognized as an expense when income me is finally recorded.
