NEW QUESTION: 2

Docker, a container management system, allows you to run applications in isolated containers. You have a Docker container named 'myapp' that is running a service. The container's configuration file is located at /etc/docker/containers/myapp/docker-compose.yml. You want to check the status of the service inside the container. Which command should you use?

Run the following command to check the status of the service inside the container:

docker exec -it myapp cat ./data/log/*.error | grep service_status

- A. docker exec -it myapp cat ./data/log/*.error | grep service_status
- B. docker exec -it myapp cat ./data/log/*.error | grep service_status
- C. docker exec -it myapp cat ./data/log/*.error | grep service_status
- D. docker exec -it myapp cat ./data/log/*.error | grep service_status

Answer: B

Explanation:

Some RUN commands depend on the ability to pipe the output of one command into another, using the pipe character (|), as in the following example:

RUN wget -O - https://some.site | wc -l &gt; /number

Docker executes these commands using the /bin/sh -c interpreter, which only evaluates the exit code of the last operation in the pipe to determine success. In the example above this build step succeeds and produces a new image so long as the wc -l command succeeds, even if the wget command fails. Reference:
