NEW QUESTION: 2You have two EBGP peers connected via two parallel serial lines. What should you do to be able to load-balance between two EBGP speakers over the parallel serial lines in both directions?A. nothing, BGP automatically load-balances the traffic between different autonomous systems on all available linksB. configure a loopback as update source for both EBGP peers and have on each AS an IGP to introduce two equal-cost paths to reach the EBGP peer loopback address; it is also necessary to use the next-hop-self commandC. use the ebgp-load-balance command on the neighbor statement on both sidesD. configure a loopback as update source for both EBGP peers and have on each AS an IGP to introduce two equal-cost paths to reach the peer loopback address; it is also necessary to use the ebgp-multihop and next-hop-self commandsE. peer between the eBGP speaker's loopbacks, configuring eBGP multihop as required, and use an IGP to load-share between the two equal-cost paths between the loopback addressesAnswer: D

Explanation:Cisco 350-001 Exam This example illustrates the use of loopback interfaces, update-source, and ebgp-multihop. The example is a workaround in order to achieve load balancing between two eBGP speakers over parallel serial lines. In normal situations, BGP picks one of the lines on which to send packets, and load balancing does not happen. With the introduction of loopback interfaces, the next hop for eBGP is the loopback interface. You use static routes, or an IGP, to introduce two equal-cost paths to reach the destination. RTA has two choices to reach next hop 160.10.1.1: one path via 1.1.1.2 and the other path via 2.2.2.2. RTB has the same choices. Load balancing with parallel EBGP sessions Establishing parallel EBGP sessions across parallel links between two edge routers (EBGP peers), as displayed in Figure 1, is the most versatile form of EBGP load balancing. It does not require static routing or extra routing protocol (like the design running EBGP between routers' loopback interfaces), IOS-specific tricks (configuring the same IP address on multiple interfaces) or specific layer-2 encapsulation (like Multilink PPP). It even allows proportional load-balancing across unequal-bandwidth links and combinations of various layer-2 technologies (for example, load-balancing between a serial line and an Ethernet interface). The only drawback of this design is the increased size of the BGP table, as every BGP prefix is received from the EBGP neighbor twice.Figure 1: Parallel EBGP sessionsCisco 350-001 Exam Basic configuration To implement parallel EBGP sessions, configure multiple neighbors on both

EBGP routers, one for each IP subnet (parallel link between the EBGP peers) and enable EBGP multipath load balancing with the maximum paths router configuration command. A sample configuration is shown in the following table: Cisco 350-001 ExamReference

NEW QUESTION: contoso.com Active Directory Windows Server 2012 R2 Server1. Server1 is a member of the contoso.com domain. Server1 is configured with the following command: ipconfig /flushdns. Which of the following actions will ensure that Server1 can resolve the IP address of the server named server1.contoso.com? (Select two.)

Options:

- A. Restart the DNS Client service on Server1.
- B. Restart the Netlogon service on Server1.
- C. Restart the DNS Client service on the domain controller.
- D. Restart the Netlogon service on the domain controller.

Answer: D Explanation: The ipconfig /flushdns command flushes the local DNS cache on the client. To ensure that the client can resolve the IP address of the server named server1.contoso.com, the Netlogon service must be restarted on the domain controller. The Netlogon service is responsible for updating the DNS records for the domain controller. The DNS Client service is responsible for resolving the IP address of the server named server1.contoso.com.
