NEW QUESTION: 1You are configuring the principals needed to fulfill the security requirements of an application within a sandbox environment that uses the WebLogic Server-embedded LDAP server.The given security requirements provided have outlined the following facts about some test principals:One security requirement states that internal patient data can be viewed only by physicians who are employees.What is an appropriate way to fulfill this security requirement from a principal perspective using the provided information?A. Create authorization policies for individual users whose employee attribute is true creating a constraint-only model, bypassing the use of a role entirely. B. Create an ACL that grants access if a user is a member of the physicians group and their employee attribute is true, bypassing the use of a role entirely. C. Create an authorization policy that denies access if a user is a member of the physicians group and their employee attribute is false, bypassing the use of a role entirely. D. Create an authorization policy that grants access if a user is a member of the physicians group and their employee attribute is true, bypassing the use of a role entirely.

Answer: B Explanation: Explanation/Reference: Security policies replace access control lists (ACLs) and answer the question "Who has access to a WebLogic resource?". You assign security policies to any of the defined WebLogic resources (for example, an EJB resource or a JNDI resource) or to attributes or operations of a particular instance of a WebLogic resource (an EJB method or a servlet within a Web application). If you assign a security policy to a type of WebLogic resource, all new instances of that resource inherit that security policy. Security policies assigned to individual resources or attributes override security policies assigned to a type of WebLogic resource.
