The pair of elements is the subject and object, and the subject has an upper bound lower then the upper bound of the object being accessed.B. The pair of elements is the subject and object, and the subject has an upper bound equal or higher than the upper bound of the object being accessed.C. The pair of elements is the subject and object, and the subject has no access rights in relation to an object.D. The pair of elements is the subject and object, and the subject has no special upper or lower bound needed within the lattice.Answer: B*Explanation: Explanation/Reference:Explanation:A lattice is a mathematical construct that is built upon the notion of a group. The most common definition of the lattice model is "a structure consisting of a finite partially ordered set together with least upper and greatest lower bound operators on the set."Two methods are commonly used for applying mandatory access control:Rule-based (or label-based) access control: This type of control further defines specific conditions for access to a requested object. A Mandatory Access Control system implements a simple form of rule-based access control to determine whether access should be granted or denied by matching:- An object's sensitivity label- A subject's sensitivity label Lattice-based access control: These can be used for complex access control decisions involving multiple objects and/or subjects. A lattice model is a mathematical structure that defines greatest lower-bound and least upper-bound values for a pair of elements, such as a subject and an object.Incorrect Answers:B: The subject's upper bound must be equal or higher, not lower than the upper bound of the object being accessed.C: The subject must have an upper bound.D: The subject must have access rights determined by an upper bound.References:Harris, Shon, All In One CISSP Exam Guide, 6th Edition, McGraw-Hill, 2013, p. 381
