NEW QUESTION: 3

Which one of these statements about the key elements of a good configuration process is NOT true?

- A. Control modifications to system hardware in order to prevent resource changes
- B. Ensure that all requirements remain clear, concise, and valid
- C. Ensure changes, standards, and requirements are communicated promptly and precisely
- D. Accommodate the reuse of proven standards and best practices

Answer: A

Explanation:

Explanation/Reference:

Explanation:

Standards are developed to outline proper configuration management processes and approved baseline configuration settings. Systems can be tested against what is laid out in the standards, and systems can be monitored to detect if there are configurations that do not meet the requirements outlined in the standards.

A good configuration process will follow proven standards and best practices. Requirements must remain clear, concise, and valid. Changes, standards, and requirements must be communicated promptly and precisely.

The statement "Control modifications to system hardware in order to prevent resource changes" is not a key element of a good configuration process. Modifications to system hardware should be controlled by a change control procedure.

Incorrect Answers:

A: Accommodating the reuse of proven standards and best practices is one of the key elements of a good configuration process.

B: Ensuring that all requirements remain clear, concise, and valid is one of the key elements of a good configuration process.

D: Ensuring changes, standards, and requirements are communicated promptly and precisely is one of the key elements of a good configuration process.
