NEW QUESTION: 2
Which of the following statements pertaining to the security kernel is incorrect?
A. The security kernel must be small enough to be able to be tested and verified in a complete and comprehensive manner.
B. The security kernel is an access control concept, not an actual physical component.
C. The security kernel must provide isolation for the processes carrying out the reference monitor concept and they must be tamperproof.
D. The security kernel is made up of mechanisms that fall under the TCB and implements and enforces the reference monitor concept.
Answer: B
Explanation:
Explanation/Reference:

The reference monitor, not the security kernel is an access control concept.
The security kernel is made up of software, and firmware components that fall within the TCB and implements and enforces the reference monitor concept. The security kernel mediates all access and functions between subjects and objects. The security kernel is the core of the TCB and is the most commonly used approach to building trusted computing systems.
There are three main requirements of the security kernel:
* It must provide isolation for the processes carrying out the reference monitor concept, and the processes must be tamperproof.
* It must be invoked for every access attempt and must be impossible to circumvent. Thus, the security kernel must be implemented in a complete and foolproof way.
* It must be small enough to be able to be tested and verified in a complete and comprehensive manner.
The following answers are incorrect:
The security kernel is made up of mechanisms that fall under the TCB and implements and enforces the reference monitor concept. Is incorrect because this is the definition of the security kernel.
The security kernel must provide isolation for the processes carrying out the reference monitor concept and they must be tamperproof. Is incorrect because this is one of the three requirements that make up the security kernel.
The security kernel must be small enough to be able to be tested and verified in a complete and comprehensive manner. Is incorrect because this is one of the three requirements that make up the security kernel.
