NEW QUESTION: 1
Which of the following statements is not true when it comes to conducting hypothesis tests about the equality of the variances of two populations?
A. Two distinct degrees of freedoms are used, one representing each population, in order to determine the critical value.
B. This type of test mandates that the underlying populations be normally distributed.
C. The not equal to alternative hypothesis implies that if the test statistic is greater than critical value implied by the level of significance, then the null hypothesis is rejected.

Answer: C
Explanation:
The proper distribution for such a test is an F-distribution. The not equal to alternative hypothesis implies that if the test statistic is greater than critical value implied by (the level of significance divided by two), then the null hypothesis is rejected. Remember, whenever you have a two tailed test, the level of significance must be divided in two, with the resulting numbers allocated to both tails. For instance, a 10% level of significance for a two tailed test would imply that each tail area represents 5%.
