Answer: B
Explanation:
Though this sounds like a good use case for scheduled actions, both answers using scheduled actions will have 20 instances running regardless of actual demand. A better option to be more cost effective is to use a target tracking action that triggers at a lower CPU threshold.
With this solution the scaling will occur before the CPU utilization gets to a point where performance is affected. This will result in resolving the performance issues whilst minimizing costs. Using a reduced cooldown period will also more quickly terminate unneeded instances, further reducing costs.
