A company has a Microsoft Exchange Server 2010 database running on Windows Server 2008.

The Windows server contains users with dynamic mailbox growth requirements. In order to efficiently use capacity while still allowing room for extended growth, the company is considering implementing virtual provisioning on their Symmetrix VMAX for this specific mailbox database.

The company is trying to determine which option to use when performing a volume format on the NTFS partition that will contain the mailbox database. Which option should be used and why?

- A. A quick format because it only performs a read request on the thin device and does not cause any space to be allocated
- B. A quick format because it will not take as long as a regular format on thin devices
- C. A regular format because it will scan the entire volume for bad sectors
- D. A regular format because it will write zeros to every block in the file system, causing the thin device to become fully allocated

Answer: A
