http://www.cisco.com/en/US/tech/tk1132/technologies_white_paper09186a00800e79cb.sht mlPublic-Key Cryptography and Asymmetric Encryption In asymmetric encryption, two different keys are used to render data illegible to anyone who may be eavesdropping on a conversation. The certificates contain the two components of asymmetric encryption: public key and private key. Data that is encrypted with the public key can be decrypted with the private key, and vice versa. However, data encrypted with the public key cannot be decrypted with the public key. The parties who need to encrypt their communications will exchange their public keys (contained in the certificate), but will not disclose their private keys. The sending party will use the public key of the receiving party to encrypt message data and forward the cipher text (encrypted data) to the other party. The receiving party will then decrypt the cipher text with their private key. Data encrypted with the public key cannot be decrypted with the public key. This prevents someone from compromising the cipher text after acquiring both public keys by eavesdropping on the certificate exchange.
